History of Billiards

Much of our knowledge about the early history of billiards comes from accounts of its popularity among royalty and nobles. Known as the "Noble Game of Billiards" since the early 1800s, evidence suggests that people from all walks of life have enjoyed the game since its inception. By 1600, billiards was familiar enough to the public that Shakespeare referenced it in Antony and Cleopatra.

The cue stick was developed in the late 1600s. Before its invention, players used a mace, a tool with a large head, to strike the ball. However, when the ball was near a rail, the mace's large head made it difficult to use. In such cases, players would turn the mace around and use its handle, called a "queue" (meaning "tail"), to strike the ball. This eventually led to the creation of the cue stick we know today. Interestingly, for a long time, only men were allowed to use the cue stick; women were required to use the mace, as it was believed they were more likely to damage the tablecloth with the sharper cue.

Early billiard tables had flat walls for rails, serving only to keep balls from falling off. These walls resembled riverbanks and were even called "banks." Players soon discovered that balls could rebound off the rails, leading to the development of a deliberate technique known as the "bank shot." A bank shot involves striking a ball so that it bounces off a cushion before reaching its target, a skill that remains central to the game today.
